INTRODUCTION

Now more than ever, students with disabilities have access to educational supports, accommodations and resources that assist them in continuing their education beyond high school and preparing for a career. But higher education (also called postsecondary education) is more than just job training. It opens doors to new friendships, opportunities, experiences and careers. It can broaden your abilities — both socially and academically — while increasing your independence, job choices, knowledge and income.

Studies indicate that almost all colleges are enrolling students with disabilities. About 11% of college undergraduates are considered individuals with disabilities (about 707,000 students nationwide). While schools are becoming better skilled at supporting individuals with physical and learning disabilities, you may need to do a lot of research to find a school that meets your needs and goals. Designed for students with disabilities, this guide also includes information for parents, teachers, counselors, and vocational and transition staff. We hope it will make it easier for you to find resources to plan for the future and obtain the education that supports your employment goals.

While this guide focuses mainly on attending college, it also touches on other options, such as online training and technical and trade schools. Additional options include job training programs, adult education programs and new transition models for students with disabilities.

Each section of this guide is broken into subtopics that provide tips to help you prepare for higher education and website links where you can find more information. We are excited by the many possibilities ahead and hope this guide helps you on your journey.

Thinking Ahead

It is never too soon to start planning for higher education. All schooling from kindergarten through high school is designed to prepare all students for life after graduation. Now is a good time to try new things to see what you like, build skills and experiences, and start saving money — even if it is only a small amount each month.

Getting Ready for Higher Education

The better prepared you are for higher education, the easier it will be to be successful. Getting prepared includes developing good study habits, exploring educational options, considering how you will pay for higher education, and thinking about a career field. You also need to take the classes and tests required by the school(s) you want to attend. Please note, Texas high school graduation plans require different classes, and some graduation plans and class modifications may restrict admission to some schools.

While in high school, prepare yourself to assume more responsibility and advocate for yourself. If you go to college, you are responsible for registering for classes, managing your time effectively and arranging for supports and accommodations you need.

Extracurricular Activities and Volunteering

While some vocational and trade schools require a high school diploma to apply, college admission committees consider everything about you including your high school grades and scores on college entrance exams. They want to know what classes you took, life experiences, personal attitudes and academic interests that show both your strengths and the challenges you face.

Colleges cannot deny you admission only because you have a disability, but you need to demonstrate that you will make a good student. Typical extracurricular activities could be participating in clubs, sports, doing volunteer work or some type of community service. Keep a list of the following:

- hobbies
- religious activities
- training and camps attended
- skills learned while in high school
- awards received or accomplishments

Keep track of your extracurricular activities including dates, times and number of hours. Keeping a list will make it easier to complete applications for higher education, scholarships and financial aid.

Employment and Career Goals: What You Want to Do Affects School Options

Your interests, abilities and goals will affect the kinds of jobs you may want and what schools you should attend. To get some ideas on what kind of work you want to do, you can take vocational interest and aptitude tests and talk with your family, friends, teachers and counselors. Once you know what kind of job you want, explore the training and schools that will prepare you and work best for you.

Types of Schools and Special Options

There are many types of schools to choose from depending on your career and personal goals, budget, individual preferences, accommodations needed and other factors. There are also some special options for students with disabilities, including an option for students who receive special education services to continue their high school education after graduation. Some individuals can attend community college classes while still receiving special education support from their school district.

Other possibilities include:

- Two-year community or junior colleges
- Four-year colleges
- College programs designed specifically for students with disabilities
- Vocational, technical or trade schools, or internships and apprenticeship programs that prepare you for a specific job
- Adult education courses at many school districts and community colleges that provide training for adults who would like to learn new skills.

Can't Afford School or Need a Break?

Going straight from high school to higher education isn't a good fit for everyone. Some people want a break, a chance to achieve a personal goal or time to earn money for school. You can also use this time to do volunteer work, take remedial classes or strengthen skills in weak subjects, or gain new experiences and increase your self-advocacy abilities. Another option is serving in AmeriCorps, which provides educational funds and a small stipend for doing community service jobs.

RESOURCES FOR PARENTS, EDUCATORS AND STUDENTS

Parents, teachers and other professionals have an important role in encouraging you and other students with disabilities to attend higher education and helping you achieve your goals as you enter adulthood. This includes supporting you in preparing and applying for college, as well as making the transition to higher education and directing your own life. General college resources also offer important information about higher education that can help you and other students with disabilities to reach your goals. The following resources can be beneficial for students with disabilities, parents and professionals.

Selecting a School: The Application Process

In choosing and applying to a school, it is important to look at the school's full environment including learning opportunities and other characteristics, such as accessibility, supports, social aspects and inclusiveness, and work opportunities after completing the training.

Choose the Best School for You

Finding a school that meets your individual needs, goals and preferences becomes easier when you think about what you want and the type of environment that works best for you.

First think about what job you want and what schools will prepare you for it. Then look for a good academic and social match. Some things to consider include:

- where you want to live
- school and living costs
- if you prefer a small or large school
- if the campus is accessible
- transportation
- what accommodations are available
- if the people are welcoming and the school feels inclusive.

Also think about applying to alternative schools in case you do not get accepted into your first school of choice.

Many students start with community college and then transfer to a four-year college to save money, to allow more time to decide on a career, or because they do not feel prepared yet for a four-year college. A lot of online research can be done on a school, but nothing reveals more than a campus visit. When you tour a school, you can meet with advisors, ask about financial aid, and request an appointment with the school's Office of Disability Services to see what accommodations they can provide such as adaptive technology, tutors or other services.

You can also ask to talk with other students who have disabilities about their experiences, or ask to sit in on a class as a prospective student (maybe going with another student with disabilities).

Admissions and Placement Testing

Some technical schools have no entrance requirements other than high school graduation. Most four-year colleges require you to take the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) or the American College Test (ACT) entrance exams. Most students take one of these tests two times to improve their score. If you want accommodations for the test, submit the required documentation at least two months before the test date. Community colleges often require students to take the ASSET or COMPASS tests to identify their strengths or determine if extra training is needed in any areas. You can apply for accommodations for these tests too.

College Applications, Essays and More

Each school has its own application process and deadlines, so be sure to check what the individual school requires. To make it a little easier, all public universities in Texas — as well as many community and private colleges — use the same basic admission application.

Most colleges also require you to complete at least one essay. The topics change each year and may give you an opportunity to discuss your disability as it relates to your life experiences, personal attitudes and academic interests. Schools often want letters of recommendation too. Letters are usually from teachers, but they can be from other adults or professionals who know you. You also need to submit high school (and college) transcripts that show the classes you took and your grades.

Working with High School, Transition and Vocational Staff

Selecting a career path and navigating the admissions process and costs and demands of higher education is challenging. You can ask for help from teachers, school counselors, as well as vocational and transition staff.

The Texas Department of Assistive and Rehabilitative Services (DARS) can also help you plan for the transition to higher education and work. DARS staff can assist you with participating in ARD meetings, getting disability evaluations and tests, and work training including college, technical schools and on-the-job training.

Please note, you may need recent disability testing and documentation to get accommodations in higher education schools, so check ahead of time to see if the documentation you have meets what is required by the school you want to attend. Your high school or DARS may be able to help you get updated tests during your last year of special education services, but DARS can only help with testing if they need to test you to determine if you qualify for services.

Plan How to Pay for School

There are many ways to pay for college from building a savings account or college fund, to applying for scholarships and loans and participating in a school's work-study program.

Financial aid application deadlines vary, and some schools bundle aid programs into one application to make it easier. You can also check on scholarships for students with disabilities, assistance with disability-related expenses, and help from the Department of Assistive and Rehabilitative Services.

Most scholarships require you to re-apply each year. The average cost for tuition, books and supplies, and room and board for two semesters at the state's four-year public colleges in 2014-2015 is $17,842.

Congratulations: You Are Accepted

Higher education is very different from high school. There is more freedom and more responsibility. You will be expected to make all arrangements for yourself and complete all course assignments without any prompting. While attending classes and staying on top of homework are important, so are social activities, clubs and relationships. The key is to find a healthy balance.

Adjusting to Higher Education

Once you are accepted into a school, the following can make the transition easier:

- Register for a campus orientation and ask if they have a summer transition program.
- Register for classes and learn your way around campus. Visit your classrooms to learn where they are and check accessibility.
- Arrange for housing, transportation, meals, and paying bills.
- Arrange for supports and develop back-up plans. If you want accommodations or supports from the school, submit documentation on your disability.
- Collect health care documents and determine whom to contact and where to go in case of an emergency.
- If you want the school to share information with your parents, consider signing a release.

Working with Disability Services and Other Supports

It's important to seek help when you need it and arrange for reliable supports. This will help minimize stress, improve your grades, and help you qualify for financial aid.

For disability accommodations, you must disclose your disability and provide the required documentation about your disability. This is usually done before classes start with the school's disability services office — staff can tell you what is needed. Also, ask if there is a special disability orientation, discuss what accommodations you will need, and find out what services and supports the school can provide including adaptive technology, tutors or other services. Some schools are better at providing supports than others, and accommodations must be requested each semester. If you are requesting accommodations, you need to give accommodations letters to your teachers, discuss your support needs, and advocate to ensure accommodations are provided to you if needed.

Talk with all of your teachers even if you are not requesting accommodations. Most teachers are willing to work with students who get to know them, participate in class, and ask for help.

Talk with other students with disabilities who can give you valuable tips, see if there are mentors on campus, and get the phone numbers and email addresses of fellow students in your classes for when you need something explained. If your disabilities affect your capacity to succeed in some classes, the disability services office may help you request substitute classes for classes that are not essential for your major.

You can also use supports available to all students such as counseling services, help with study skills, proofreading services, study groups and websites that rate teachers to help you choose classes that match your learning style. A learning coach or a tutor can help you with choosing classes, creating a study schedule and degree planning.

Self-Advocacy and Understanding Your Rights and Responsibilities

You have to find out about the many resources there are at the school and community to help you succeed in higher education. Ask for help and stand up for yourself, your goals and your rights — no one will be checking to see how you are doing. You are responsible for all aspects of your higher education from selecting classes that meet your degree plan to paying bills, obtaining supports, attending classes, completing class work on time, eating well and getting enough sleep.

If you live at home or close to home, your parents and friends may provide some support allowing you to gradually take control of more parts of your life. Getting to know other students will help you adjust to school and new responsibilities and give you ideas on succeeding.

It is normal to feel overwhelmed at times. It can help to make lists of what you need to do, work ahead, do the best you can in the time available, and plan time for fun and consider joining student clubs and organizations related to your studies.

Higher education is a time to learn more about yourself and your chosen career while enjoying new experiences and taking control of your own life.

Know the Law

The main laws protecting college students with disabilities are the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, which both prohibit discrimination against “otherwise qualified” individuals on the basis of disability.

While colleges are required to provide reasonable accommodations to make their programs accessible to students with disabilities, they are not required to provide personal services such as occupational or speech therapy, individual tutoring, classroom aides for such non-academic purposes as self-care or handling materials, and transportation.

What If You Don't Get Accepted into a School?

It's always smart to think about what you will do if you are not accepted into any school where you applied, including the following:

- Consider if other schools or types of training will meet your goals. Community colleges usually have an open door admissions policy for individuals who have graduated from high school or have a GED. Many students start here and then transfer to other schools.

- Contact the school's admissions office and ask what would improve your chances of being admitted the next semester.
- Look for classes or other training to strengthen weak skill areas.
- Ask if it is possible to get a waiver or probation that allows you to be admitted on a trial basis — this may give you time to show you can handle the workload and earn good grades.
- Consider volunteering or apply for a job related to your career choice.
- Consider other career options you would like.
